Excerpt: .in through the gate of the Yoshiwara right into the full blaze of the garish lights streaming from the parti-coloured lanterns swinging at the doorways and from the cages. He dismounted, and strolled past the sake1 shops and tea-houses, and what he once called in the Chronicle gaily-bedizened be vies of frailty on exhibition, squatting, pipe in hand, in long rows behind their lacquer brazier--each house with its distinctive crest--with the whole entourage repeated in duplicate in the huge plate-glass mirrors that in most cases formed the panelling of the walls of the show-room. Through streets on streets of this description he fared, with their motley crowds of all nationalities and tongues and colours. English Jacks elbowed their way through throngs of pig-tailed Chinamen, here and there jabbering and chaffering and cheapening the wares the fox-visaged, bullet-headed gyu kept on crying and extolling and thrusting upon the favourable notice of this huge Japanese Vanity Fair; fairhaired Scandinavians and Teutons and Slavs jostled with swarthy niggers and Lascars and scedy-boy firemen from the mail-boats in the offing; while scraps of French and the languages of Southern Europe set you a-thinking of Alexandria and Port Said and Ismailia in spite of yourself. All this shot over a fabric of native texture, by way of embroidery as it were, was not unsuggestive of the basement of the Tower of Babel, with the Devil and the Flesh as skipper and first mate respectively, after the Lord had worked his...
